Pay my sprint bill with a check

Hiding from your money problems won't fix them. If you can't afford to pay all your bills this month, here's what you need to do to take responsibility for the situation and fix it as soon as possible (with the least amount of damage to your credit score). Go over your list of expenses and cancel anything that's not the key to your survival. Cable/satellite, streaming services, newspaper subscriptions, extra phone features, paid memberships - they should all go until you have your finances back on track. Late payments and skipped payments are bad news for your credit score and can cause you to lose your home or car, so make a hard push to earn the money you need to cover your budget gap. Sell a few things, pick up a side job, roll coins - do everything in your power to pay your bills on time. There are a bunch of ways to raise cash quickly; see if there are any ideas you may have overlooked before deciding to go the non-payment route. If you are currently paying on student loans or medical bills, you must free up money by negotiating new repayment terms. Federal student loans can be placed in tolerance or deferral if you are in a tight spot, which will allow you to reduce your payments or to temporarily stop making payments. Medical bills are even easier to renegotiate. Just call the accounting office, explain what you can afford to pay, and they'll usually work with you. If you still don't have enough money to cover your bills, it's time to decide which bills you're going to pay now and what's going to have to wait. Go through your list of monthly expenses and mark all items that are essential to your existence as a top priority. You should include things like your rent/mortgage, utilities and insurance. Mark all insured debt as your next priority. This includes things like car loans, home equity loans and any other debt that collateral attached to them has. Mark all unsecured debt as your last priority. This includes things like credit card debt, personal loans, and most services-related accounts. Once you've prioritized all of your accounts, make a list of the accounts you're not going to be able to pay right away. Now that you've done everything you can to reduce the damage, it's time to let your creditors know what's going on. Call each one up before your account is due (not after) and explain your situation. It won't be a fun call, but it can help keep you out of trouble. Many creditors are willing to offer deferred payments, reduced payments, a late fee waiver or an extended deadline if you haven't had a problem in the past - and it could go a long way toward saving your credit score and getting your finances back on track. Source: iStock A recent Bankrate survey finds that more than out of three Americans making bill governance a top financial priority. For some people, managing bills comes naturally and doesn't take much thought or effort. For others, however, the account payment process is a huge big which sometimes leads to late payment fees, calls from collectors and overwhelming anxiety. If the second description sounds more like you, it's time to make a change. Here are some ways to make managing your accounts a little less challenging. 1. Don't throw your bills in a pile of Source: iStock While it might be easier to just throw your bills in a heap on your desktop and return to it later, the chances of actually remembering to open the account and paying them on time are slim. If you receive paper statements, organize your accounts by buying an account organizer that you can place on top of your desk or kitchen counter. Another option is to arrange for your accounts to be emailed so that you can avoid the account heap altogether. 2. Set up a payment calendar source: iStock Establish a calendar reserved just to track your payment dates. It can be a paper calendar that you hang on your wall or a digital calendar. Type the names of your creditors in the appropriate calendar cells. If you opt for the digital reminder, set up alerts at least five days before the deadline so you'll remember to send your payment. In terms of billing payments, good intentions don't count. What matters is to submit your payments on time and fully. The billing representative couldn't care less if you meant to send in your payment, but you just forgot. Everyone is busy, so you get no sympathy. 3. Pay your bills once they come Source: iStock If your memory is so bad that memories don't work, your best choice is to pay your bills once you get them in the mail or by email. This way, you won't be burdened with remembering to send your payment. It eliminates excuses and the possibility of late or missed payments. 4. Use technology source: Thinkstock Try one of the many account payment apps available. Technology can make your financial life a lot easier. Account payment programs can help you track deadlines, managing simple budgets, getting control over spending and achieving financial goals. Two programs to be considered are Mint Bills and Goodbudget. Follow Sheiresa on Twitter and Facebook. More from Money & Career Cheat Sheet: Online bill payment is a digital banking or payment service that lets you pay bills on the web from a bank account – often at no extra cost. This can simplify your finances by eliminating the need to write out checks or count and distribute paper currency. It takes a few minutes to set up your online account payment, but once set up, you don't have to worry about missing payments. Understanding what online account pays and how it works can help streamline your cash flow and simplify your life. Online account payment is a service that allows you to for your accounts online. This service can usually be set up by your bank or directly by service providers. With the banking model, you give your financial institution information about recipients to whom you owe money, whether it's bank or a business, and the bank sends money to that recipient. Depending on the payer, the bank will issue an electronic payment or a paper check using funds pulled from your control, money market or other suitable account within one to five days. If a recipient company is already set up within the bank's system, the bank can often transfer the money electronically on the same day. Many banks impose no limit on the number of accounts you can pay through the feature. You grant phone companies, mortgage companies, utility providers or other service providers your bank account information so they can opt out of the account to pay for the company's services. Electronic payments often reach payers within two days or less, while paper checks can take four or five days depending on the bank. To set up online account payments, you'll need to create an online account with your bank or service provider and then set up your account for payments. Follow these guidelines to set up payments through your bank or service provider. To make payments online through your bank, login to your bank's website and go to the Bill Pay section. Click on the relevant link to add a new payer, and then type the name of the recipient company. You will need a copy of a bill issued to you by a service provider so that you can copy the address and your account number, along with any other essential information, from the account. Enter the desired payment amount and schedule and complete the setup sequence. After that, every time you want to make a payment, simply enter the amount of the account and schedule your payment. To establish online account payment with a service provider, you often have to provide a void check and an authorization form to give the company permission in question to withdraw funds from your bank account. You will be asked to provide bank account information such as your account number and any route numbers associated with the checking account, whether in the authorization form or separately. In some cases, you might be able to provide your debit card information instead of a checking account. You may also be able to deliver bank account information online without providing a void check, but you may need to verify your account in a different way. Again, you'll be asked to specify the payment amount and schedule before completing the account payment setup. A typical payment date is the deadline for the account for the company, but you need to confirm that your payment will be credited as on time. Once things get started, payment will go directly from your bank account to your service provider. Once you've set up the payment system, your bank or service provider will generally give you the option to make one of a few useful types of payments through online Pay: One-time payments: As the name suggests, this is a payment you issue a single time. This option makes sense for services you rarely use, such as a landscaper or a lump sum payment on a car. Future payments: This online account payment option gives you the ability to schedule payments later. Use this online account payment option when your account date isn't in the near future, but you want to set up a payment in advance so you don't forget it later. Recurring payments: These are generally payments you make at regular intervals, such as monthly or quarterly. Health insurance premium bills, utility bills or monthly bills for childcare are examples. If you love automated processes that you don't need your constant attention, automated online account payment facilitates one-time or recurring payments on a regulated basis by a bank or service provider. By automating one-time payments, you can authorize your service providers to pull money from your account for irregular, one-time expenses without any activity on your part. For instance, you can automatically make your bank payments on a rarely used credit card when the card adcpus a non-zero balance. If you automate recurring payments, your online bill payment service can pay your monthly phone bill or your quarterly insurance payment. Automating online account payment for regular expenses is a great way to pay on time and prevent late fees from being incurred. If you authorize these types of payments, keep enough available funds in your account to cover them. Online bill pay can save time, reduce paperwork and make life easier, but it can also lead to a negative account balance and associated fees if you set up withdrawals that exceed your balance. Shrewdly budgeting and paying attention to your balance can help you make the most of this convenient banking feature. Paying online account is a convenient service offered by many banks, credit unions, and service providers, which allows you to set up automatic electronic payments for your accounts. Payments can bet set up for one-time, future, or automated recurring transactions. To use this service, you need to create an online account with your bank or service provider and provide you with payment information. Always make sure you have enough money in your account to cover any payments you make online. Online.
